In addition, the subclinical ADHD symptoms in these parents are associated with more severe ADHD symptoms in the children. The study appears in the journal Child Neuropsychology. Between 20 and 50 percent of children with ADHD experience subclinical ADHD symptoms. The specific nature of these symptoms varies, but in some cases parents may experience symptoms similar to their children. In the new study, researchers from the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine explored this link by following up with 93 parents of children with ADHD and 73 parents of typically developing children. Parents completed self-report questionnaires and received a structured diagnostic interview that assessed ADHD symptoms in their children. When the parents completed the questionnaire, they answered questions about their own ADHD symptoms as well. The researchers found that the parents of children with ADHD were more likely to report that they had ADHD symptoms themselves. In addition, they found that the ADHD symptoms of these parents were related to ADHD symptoms in their children. This suggests that although children with ADHD do not have ADHD themselves, parents with ADHD symptoms may share these symptoms with their children. It is important to note that the parent sample reported similar levels of ADHD symptoms to the child sample, but the parent sample included a higher percentage of parents with severe ADHD symptoms. Children with ADHD exhibit higher levels of inattention and hyperactivity-impulsivity. They also have lower levels of parent involvement, higher levels of negative emotion, and less cognitive flexibility than their typically developing peers. It is possible that parents with ADHD symptoms display some of these symptoms in their children. However, more research is needed to investigate this link. "This study provides some evidence that ADHD parents are more 82157476af
